Choose Your Own Course

A Respondent accused of dating violence and stalking voluntarily withdraws from your community college after finalization of the investigative report but before the hearing. The lawyer hired by his family makes clear that if the school continues with the process and reaches

Should You

-  Move forward with the hearing in the interests of resolving a student determination as to whether the Respondent is responsible for acts of violence and stalking;
-  Dismiss the case on the grounds that it is not responsible for the acts of the school;
-  Dismiss the case and bar the Respondent from re-admission due to his withdrawal in the midst of an ongoing process;
-  D. Dismiss the case, but inform the administration of the charges and if the Respondent wishes to return to the institution, the case may be re-opened for resolution?

Choose Your Own Course

You dismiss the case without further action, but reserve the right to address the allegations again should the Respondent ever apply for re-admission. Two years later, the Respondent does apply for re-admission. By that time, the Complainant has finished their certification program and is no longer at the school. The Respondent is in good academic and financial standing and has no disciplinary record other than the Title IX allegations that were not adjudicated due to his prior withdrawal.

Should You

- A. Grant readmission without further analysis of the incident.
- B. Deny admission on the grounds previously in order to prevent the disciplinary process.
- C. Re-engage the respondent.
- D. Carefully determine whether to re-engage the grievance process taking into account such factors as the former Complainant's willingness to participate in the process, the nature of the original allegations, the Respondent's explanation for withdrawal and re-application, and any other factors to the school community?

Should You

Grant admission without further analysis because the Complainant no longer is at the institution.

Deny admission on the grounds that the Respondent withdrew from school previously in order to circumvent the grievance process.

Re-engage the grievance process and proceed to a hearing and finding and assign responsibility, then address the Complainant's concerns for the finding, or

Carefully determine whether to re-engage the grievance process, taking into account such factors as are relevant for the Complainant's ability to participate in the process, the nature of the original allegation, the Respondent's explanation for withdrawal, and the impact of the finding on the school community?
